"But who is going to get Mr. Dog to come?" asked Tim. "I do not want to be the one to carry the invitation to him."

"Oh, I am going to send it over by Jim Crow," said Mr. Fox. "That is safe enough, and I shall have Jim tell him that we think it time all of us were friends; we all belong to the four-footed face."

So off the three went to find Jim Crow, and they found him in good humor, for he had just dined off of the corn Mr. Man had planted.

"Yes, I'll take your invitation to him." said Jim. "But what do I get out of it—do I get invited, too."

"Why, of course," said Mr. Fox. "you are invited to the party, and you shall have all the corn you can cat. I'll get a bagful from Mr. Man's barn this very night. No one else will like it, so you will have all you can eat."

"But the party begins," said Mr. Fox.

"Did you ever see such a fellow—afraid he won't get his pay?" whishered Mr. Fox to Tim and Billy.

"And tell Mr. Dog that we have declided that we shall not go over to Mr. Man's any more, said Mr. Fox. "But I thought you said you were going over there to get my corn, so how can I tell Mr. Dog that you are not going to Mr. Man's any more? asked Jim Crow, sticking out his head in a very angry manner.

"Of course, you will be paid," said Mr. Fox. going to bother Mr. Man's hen coops any more, don't you see?"

"Oh," said Jim Crow, stretching his wings, "well, I'll tell Mr. Dog what you say, but don't forget the corn."

They watched Jim Crow out of sight and sat down to wait for his return, and then Mr. Fox told Tim and Billy Possum how he intended to keep Mr. Dog away from the farm for one night at least. Tomorrow I will tell you his plan and the rest of the story. (Continued tomorrow.)

Fred Jackson, the popular short story writer, and, like the other Selwyn larce hits, was first offered in New York City at the Harris Theater, where it enjoyed a long and prosperous run. Written solely for the purpose of producing laughter, it has generally been conceded that it more than fills this objective and received generous approval from the metropolitan critics. A more than ordinarily competent company of farceurs has been provided as well as a splendid scenic equipment, some of those in the cast are Gordon Eldred, Reeva Greenwood, Irma Heath, Gertrude Walthers, Henry Keen and W. H. Crosby. Cahill and Romaine Good. Had it not been for the "turn" of Jack Cahill and Den Romaine at the Lyric last night the audience would have come away more bored than usual. These clever impersonators in fifteen minutes of clean, but enjoyable, comedy and good singing and yodeling got across unusually well, and saved an otherwise rather duli bill. The act was far above par. Lehr, Edimendson and Marr were styled as "The Boys From Over There" on the program, probably meaning that they saw service in France. If this is the case, it is regrettable that they were not sent into Germany with the army of occupation and audiences on this side spared their attemps at singing and comedy. They could neither sing nor be funny, although they seemed to be well pleased with their own efforts. It took an especially good act like that of Cahill and Romaine to convince those present that they were witnessing a real show. The Renzettas opened the bill with a juggling act. Van D. Shelton & Co. put on a bombastic one-act comedy, called "Married Life," and Jonia, very modestly called the Pearl of Hawaii on the program, and her company of Hiwaiians tried desperately to keep the audience seated until the close of the show, but falled.
